We got our hands on an early copy from Ikea and thought we'd share our first take — and some photos — on what's in store at the design giant from Sweden. From living rooms to walk-in closets, bedrooms to kitchens, the 2014 Ikea catalog has placed an emphasis on warm, darker tones for natural, comfortable living.View in galleryThe 326 pages of the new 2014 Ikea catalog represent a virtual stroll through the aisles of the Ikea superstore. Everything from fully-planned rooms to grouped products and individual items are showcased like Ikea catalogs of the past. In recent years, Ikea has emphasized a group of products (like storage in the 2011 version), but the 2014 Ikea catalog takes a general approach.View in galleryA stand-out design element is the use of dark colors and earth tones to create a warm, welcoming environment. The living room above features accent walls and gray tones with natural wood elements to provide a homey feel. It's instantly desirable, and a point of inspiration for our own living rooms at home.View in galleryThe 2014 Ikea catalog features new products, placed prominently in room designs and individual features. The Stockholm Chandelier above, for example, is a stand-out favorite. It's placed in what might be the most attractive walk-in closet we've seen, but we'll take a look at that below.View in galleryBeyond the typical room designs and product groupings, the 2014 Ikea catalog does share some rich, usable content. The above section features seven tips on updating your bathroom, featuring some pretty attractive products that again emphasize natural woods and a focus on greenery.View in galleryThis walk-in closet is sure to cause a bit of drooling for some. It features a wall of shoes, a set of colorful seats and the aforementioned Stockholm chandelier. It's a place for the ladies to show off their shoes with friends while sharing a bottle (or two) of fine wine. Throughout all the pages of the 2014 Ikea catalog, this is one we imagine will get clipped out the most.View in galleryThe same earth tones and wooden accents are shown off in this pretty dreamy kitchen. It's a very welcome step forward for Ikea, who in the past has placed an emphasis on colors that haven't aged too well. That's part of the point, though– after five years, it's about time to update your bedroom or living room for something that feels fresh and new.View in galleryCheck your mailbox for the 2014 Ikea Catalog, which should be arriving any day now. If you don't receive one, either stop by your local Ikea store or sign up for your catalog using Ikea's catalog request form online. But the company's approach to physical retail is changing, alongside its evolving digital strategy. Following a 40% drop in its profits over the last year, Ikea has announced plans to build smaller stores with footprints that are easier to build in cities. The first smaller location, opening this fall in Tottenham Court Road in central London, signals another shift, too: Its restaurant won't serve any meatballs–not even futuristic meatballs made out of bugs and stuff.The new approach, reported by The Times, is being led by Ikea U.K. retail manager Javier Quiñones. It appears to be a European strategy for now, but would be sensible for the company's other markets across the globe. We've seen chains ranging from Target and Sephora to Whole Foods and Taco Bell embrace smaller store concepts to squeeze their brands into increasingly dense and expensive urban environments. Smaller stores cost less to operate, and they're potentially faster to open. Ikea's smaller store concept can be opened within six months, while large-scale Ikea stores take an average of three to four years.Even if these stores can't carry everything a flagship location would, they can serve as a showroom–a more accessible place to get a physical experience with Ikea's brand. Besides, having more locations may come with a secondary benefit: It creates a network of delivery hubs that could compete with the lightning-fast shipping times of companies like Amazon. Ikea is investing heavily in its own delivery infrastructure, and within the next year, it wants to gain the capacity to allow customers to order any of its 10,000 products online and receive them within a day. We can only hope those options will include the famous meatballs.
